Vietnam's a winner in U.S.-China trade war

By David Pahre

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — The expansion of China's textile industry in Vietnam has been a major feature of the two countries' trade relationship for more than a decade, with the Vietnamese government eager to attract foreign investment to boost its economy.

But the recent surge in Chinese investment has been accompanied by growing concerns about the impact on Vietnam's labor force and environment.

Vietnam's labor force has grown rapidly in recent years, but it has also become one of the most exploited in the world, with workers often forced to work long hours for low wages.

Environmentalists and human rights groups have long criticized China's treatment of workers in its textile factories, and Vietnam has been no exception.

The expansion of Chinese investment in Vietnam has also fuelled concerns about the country's environment, with reports of pollution and deforestation.

Vietnam's government has been under pressure to address these issues, but it has also been accused of not doing enough to protect the environment.

The expansion of Chinese investment in Vietnam is a reflection of the country's growing economic importance, but it also highlights the challenges it faces in balancing economic growth with environmental sustainability.

Vietnam's government has been working to address these issues, but it has also been accused of not doing enough to protect the environment.